The Target: A Fort Knox of Riches

Donnelly's target was not an ordinary bank or jewelry store. Instead, he set his sights on a seemingly impenetrable fortress: the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta. This institution housed an astonishing $400 million in cash, a sum that ignited Donnelly's greedy aspirations.

With meticulous planning, Donnelly studied the bank's security measures, exploiting a flaw in its ventilation system. He meticulously assembled a team of accomplices, each possessing unique skills that would prove invaluable in executing his daring scheme.

The Daring Robbery

On a night shrouded in darkness, Donnelly and his crew infiltrated the Federal Reserve Bank, utilizing the ventilation shaft as their covert entry point. Inside the bank's vault, they encountered an unexpected hurdle: a laser beam system that triggered an alarm if disturbed. Undeterred, Donnelly's team ingeniously devised a way to bypass this obstacle, using a combination of mirrors and tape.

Another suspect was Frank "The Driver" Caruso, an experienced getaway driver with a reputation for evading the police. Caruso was allegedly responsible for transporting the stolen cash to a safe haven.
